THE FINANCIAL PLAN

The financial plan will help you (and any potential lender) estimate how much cash will be needed and when in order to start and maintain a profitable business. You'll also be able to estimate how much profit you can generate, given the level of capital you are able (or willing) to invest.

The process of creating financial projections for your business's income, cash flow and financial position will force you to think through the financial transactions you plan to complete at a fairly high level of detail. Through this process, any discrepancies, gaps or unrealistic assumptions will more than likely come to light.

The information you will need to pull the financial projections together will, for the most part, already have been created when you completed the marketing, operating and human resources plans in earlier sections. Since much of the information you'll be working with is subject to uncertainty, you'll be wise to create three sets of projections:

- a "pessimistic" scenario;
- a "most likely" scenario; and
- an "optimistic" scenario.

The change in profits and cash requirements from one scenario to another will indicate to you the degree of risk you're likely to be facing.

When preparing a financial plan for an existing business, statements for the past two or three years should be included. This gives some comparison between projections and what actually happened in previous years. In particular it allows you to see if there are any major changes in key financial ratios between the historic numbers and the projected numbers.

When the business plan is being used to acquire financing, detailed lists of inventories, accounts receivable, accounts payable, insurance coverage, copies of legal agreements, orders, letters of intent, appraisals, personal net worth statements and references may also be required.

The British Columbia Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has Planning Packages available to producers to assist them in their planning process. The following schematic illustrates how the financial planning package can be used when developing a financial plan. Copies are available from the Farm Management Branch or your closest district office.
